they may be glants for a momenjary exertion, anything like sustained effort disturbs digestion, and cuts at the very root of their nutrition. In many cases, however, the limit to exercise lies in diminished exerction.

done to the heart itself. If when the heart was overdriven it merely struck, the enfeeled circulation would soon plt a stop to further effort. The willing heart, however, taking at each beat a wider skeep and driving into the vessels a larger quantity of blood, so meets the call that the athlete can struggle on, perhaps to win his race. But the strained heart suffers, the stretched muscle does not quite come back, the dilated cavity does not quite close at each contraction, and permanent mischief is set up. Thus it is that exercise driven to the limit imposed by the heart is overexercise in the most serious sense of the word. If it is the heart that stops it, the chances are that it has already gone too far.

The curious person who watches the world from a street car platform sees strange things sometimes. Yesterday as a North Clark Street car stopped at Superfor Street a man on the side walk stopped also to watch a pretty girl get on the car. He was a brisk little man in a big overcoat, and had evidently been sent out by his wife to buy some milk for breakfast. As he looked back over his shoulder a kindly old lady who was passing paused at the sight of the small pitcher in his outsiretched hand, and, after funbling in her purse, she dropped some kind of a can into his receptacle and passed on. The clink of the evidently could not see what caused the noise, but he looked into it and then at the old lady, who was trotting along with a gracigus and happy air. The car moved on then, and whether he was angry or pleased has not yet been discovered.
